STRONG POLITICAL COMMITMENT TO EXTEND SOCIAL PROTECTION

Cambodia's social protection system has had a slow start. However, after several years, a new window of opportunity has recently opened, with the Ministry of Economy and Finance (MEF) taking the lead in developing a National Social Protection Policy Framework (NSPPF). The NSPPF brings together social insurance and social assistance under one policy document for the first time and provides a vision for the phased establishment of a social protection floor (SPF), as advocated by the ILO's Social Protection Floors Recommendation, 2012 (No.202).

The MEF's leadership has created an unprecedented momentum for the development of a social protection system owned, coordinated and financed by the government.

DESPITE THE COMMITMENT, THE ROAD AHEAD IS LONG

Social protection in Cambodia is at an initial stage and thus, there are several challenges to overcome:

- Most Khmer people have little or no effective coverage, particularly the most vulnerable.
- Civil servants enjoy a comprehensive benefit package financed through the state's budget. The introduction of contributory mechanisms is imperative for the sustainability of these provisions.
- The National Social Security Fund (NSSF) covers 1.2 million workers in the private sector, providing injury insurance, maternity benefits and most recently health insurance. However, legally and practically, coverage is limited to large enterprises.
- Workers in the informal economy, representing 90 per cent of the labour force, have no access to state provisions.

- Social assistance for poor and vulnerable people is mostly provided on a small scale by donors and non-governmental organizations. Such programmes include Health Equity Funds (HEF); Community-based Health Insurance (CBHI); school feeding and scholarships; food-for-work and cash-for-work; and maternal, child health, and nutrition programmes.

The recent developments, coupled with ongoing reforms of decentralization, provide new perspectives for the overall reform of not only the system of benefit delivery, but also of governance.

SOCIAL PROTECTION POLICY FRAMEWORK

This ambitious framework seeks to rationalize the currently fragmented system of social protection and address existing gaps through the introduction of new schemes. Priority is placed on ensuring the long-term sustainability of the existing public pension scheme. In the short term, the government is committed to introducing and expanding contributory pension and health insurance branches for the public and private sectors.

In terms of social assistance, three new initiatives are being discussed: a grant for pregnant women and children, disability allowances and social pensions for the elderly.
