CHILD-SENSITIVE SOCIAL PROTECTION

Today, around 1 billion children across the world live in poverty, and almost two thirds of children and households worldwide do not receive child or family benefits. This situation is unacceptable and has long-lasting consequences. A child who falls into poverty is likely to remain poor for a lifetime. Without adequate nutrition, health care, education, and care, children cannot develop physically and intellectually. This affects their ability to engage in productive employment later in life. Poor children are at greater risk of engaging in child labour. Breaking the vicious cycle of child poverty is key to achieving sustainable development and is particularly addressed in Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) 1.3, 4 and 8.

Child-sensitive social protection responds to the specific problems faced by children and their families. It combines essential nutrition, health care, care services and education. Child-sensitive social protection can help to alleviate poverty, realize children’s basic rights and reduce gender gaps.

Attention should be paid to vulnerable children such as orphans, children in families affected by HIV/AIDS, street children and children with disabilities. Girls are often more vulnerable to health and economic risks and affected by gender stereotypes.

Several countries have implemented child-sensitive social protection programmes. Bolsa Familia in Brazil, Oportunidades/Prospera in Mexico, the Child Pantawid Pamilyang in the Philippines, and the Child Support Grant in South Africa enhance families’ economic security through cash transfers and promote access to education and health care. Other types of programmes have positive effects on children as well. For e.g. the Expanded Public Works Programme in South Africa helps in childcare centres and services, reduces unpaid work and improves parents’ access to economic opportunities.

JOINT RESPONSE AND ACTION FOR CHILDREN

The Convention on the Rights of the Child is the first international instrument to incorporate a complete range of human rights for children, including social protection, and provides guidance to countries on protecting their children.

The ILO Social Protection Floor Recommendation, 2012 (No. 202), provides for child-sensitive social protection. One of the four social protection floors aims at ensuring access to nutrition, education, and care through cash and in-kind benefits.

The Transition from the Informal to the Formal Economy Recommendation, 2015 (No. 204), and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), also call for the provision of adequate childcare services to promote gender equality and employment opportunities and to enable the transition to the formal economy.

Several UN agencies, NGOs, the World Bank, and other development partners have also committed to support child-sensitive social protection.
CHILD SUPPORT GRANTS IN SOUTH AFRICA

Roughly 60 per cent of children in South Africa are poor. This makes social protection essential and is why 11.8 million children and their families are now receiving social assistance grants administered by the Government of South Africa.

The Child support grant provides 330 South African rands (US$27) monthly to poor children up to 18 years of age. The grant is complemented by other benefits, including the Foster Care Grant, free education, school feeding, and affordable health services.

Elizabeth Mkase has been taking care of her nephew in a poor South African neighbourhood.

I can’t even remember how many years my nephew has been with me since his parents died. Life was difficult because I did not have a job. I am grateful for the support that I was given through the grant as I didn’t know how I was going to cope, she recalled.
