Improving the lives of older persons through universal social pensions

Thailand

In 2009, Thailand succeeded in expanding pensions for older persons through the implementation of a non-contributory old-age allowance.

Until recently, Thailand's pension system included several contributory schemes for government officials, private sector employees and informal economy workers. However, coverage of the latter group was very limited. Overall, only 20 per cent of older persons had access to some level of protection. In the face of an ageing population and a large informal sector, the country sought new ways to protect older persons without coverage. In 2009, a non-contributory old-age allowance was introduced and Thailand reached universal coverage soon afterwards.

National social protection floors (SPFs) guarantee access to essential health care and basic income security for children, persons of working age and older persons.

185 countries have adopted the Social Protection Floors Recommendation, 2012 (No. 202), an approach to achieve universal social protection.

This note presents a successful country experience of expanding social protection.

Main lessons learned

- In a country with a rapidly ageing population, a large informal sector and a relatively high incidence of poverty among older persons, a non-contributory pension can go a long way towards reaching those who do not have access to any social protection in old age.
- Ineffective targeting procedures prevented nearly as well as eligible older persons from receiving a pension. A universal scheme introduced in 2009 resulted in over 5.5 million new beneficiaries by 2013.
- Poverty among the elderly has fallen, which can largely be attributed to increased pension coverage. Increasing and indexing benefits, as well as strengthening the legal and financial foundations of the scheme, could further strengthen its impact.
- Even though the benefit levels have increased steadily over time, the pension still does not provide sufficient protection.
